Phylogenetic relationships are just beginning to be made possible for non-model organisms. However, these studies have the same basic concepts as already well-studied organisms.

Question: Analysis and Answer Sheet

1. As you read across, compare the number of characters in each column and indicate on your suggested answer sheet how many characters are present in each of the studied forms and their inferred last common ancestor.

This test is completed by placing a red dot at the end of the character state for each character and tracing that red line through the studied forms. Therefore, the red number is identified as they are placed together. Differences in the number of characters are indicated by the number of dots in the column.

2. Which character is shared by most of the studied forms and which character is shared by only one of the studied forms?

The shared character is the one that is shared by most of the forms.

3. After reading your suggested answer sheet, which of the characters is shared by most of the forms and which character is shared by only one of the studied forms?

This test is completed by placing a red dot at the end of the character state for each character and tracing that red line through the forms. Therefore, the red number is identified as they are placed together. Differences in the number of characters are indicated by the number of dots in the column.

4. After reading your suggested answer sheet, which of the characters is shared by most of the forms and which character is shared by only one of the studied forms?
