

The Role of the Teacher

[illegible]

Abstract Background Despite the well-documented importance of social relationships to health, few studies have investigated a specific role played by children's (and, therefore, parents') sociality. This study explores the extent to which children's social relationships are associated with parents' self-reported health. Methods The study used data from the National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health, a nationally representative survey of adolescents aged 15–18 years and their parents. Results Children's social relationships were associated with parents' self-reported health. Children who were socially isolated had higher odds of reporting poor health than children who were socially integrated. This association was stronger for parents of children who were socially isolated than for parents of children who were socially integrated. Conclusions Children's social relationships may play a role in parents' self-reported health. Further research is needed to explore the mechanisms underlying this association.
