

CONCLUSIONS

A series of experiments have been conducted to determine the effect of the rate of change of the magnetic field on the induced current in a superconducting coil. The results show that the induced current is proportional to the rate of change of the magnetic field. The induced current is also proportional to the area of the coil and the number of turns in the coil. The induced current is independent of the resistance of the coil. The induced current is also independent of the initial magnetic field. The induced current is also independent of the time interval over which the magnetic field is changed.

These results are in good agreement with the theoretical predictions of Faraday's law of induction. The induced current is proportional to the rate of change of the magnetic field, which is the time derivative of the magnetic flux. The induced current is also proportional to the area of the coil and the number of turns in the coil, which is the magnetic flux. The induced current is independent of the resistance of the coil, which is the voltage drop across the coil. The induced current is also independent of the initial magnetic field, which is the magnetic flux. The induced current is also independent of the time interval over which the magnetic field is changed, which is the time derivative of the magnetic flux.
