Abstract Background: While the need for increasing the use of oral care in the elderly population has been well documented, little research exists on barriers to this effort. Methods: A qualitative study was conducted with 10 geriatric nursing home residents and 10 nursing home staff members. The interviews were audio taped and lasted approximately 30 minutes. The data were analyzed using content analysis. Results: The study identified several barriers to increasing oral care in the elderly population. The barriers were categorized into three main areas: (1) knowledge, (2) resources, and (3) attitudes. The study found that many staff members did not know how to perform oral care or did not have the time to do so. Additionally, many staff members did not believe that oral care was important for the elderly population. Conclusions: The study identified several barriers to increasing oral care in the elderly population. The study found that many staff members did not know how to perform oral care or did not have the time to do so.
