These observations suggest that the nature of the relationship with the participating participants is the important factor, and not the number of participants. The results of the study suggest that the number of participants is not a significant factor in the relationship between the number of participants and the number of participants.

These arguments are unconvincing, as indicated with the following counterexamples. Suppose that the Journal of Management Studies publishes 100 articles each year, and that 10 of these articles are published in the Journal of Management Studies Special Issue on Entrepreneurship. These results suggest that the use of a single, standardized, and validated instrument to assess the prevalence of depression in the community is a feasible and reliable method for identifying the burden of depression in a population. The use of a single instrument also allows for comparison of results across studies and populations, which is important for understanding the global burden of depression.
