

SECTION 3 - CHARGE & TURNABLE

EPF Assembly

The EPF assembly is a ventilation Low Pressure Regulator and a Charge Cell Assembly. The Charge Cell is an electronic valve which is controlled by an internal microprocessor. The microprocessor provides output signals to the ECU and receives input signals from a CAN-BUS network. The microprocessor also receives electrical signals from the Fuel Pressure Sensor (FPS) and the Fuel Temperature Sensor (FTS) and converts them into data for the ECU. The ECU uses the FPS and FTS data to calculate the location of the secondary valve in the EPF and sends that data back to the EPF via the CAN-BUS. The internal microprocessor in the EPF will then output a signal which causes the valve solenoid to move and position the secondary valve in the correct location.

Low Pressure Regulator (LPR)

The LPR is a combination regulator pressure regulating device. The LPR is a combination pressure regulator device that is normally closed when the engine is not running. When the engine is running, sufficient vacuum will be taken from the secondary chamber from the main leading the secondary diaphragm down into the spring loaded line and opening the secondary valve allowing regulated fuel to pass to the valve. The mechanical action in conjunction with the EPF maintains constant the increased action on the second valve causing it to open when allowing more fuel to flow to the main.

NOTE

For best use, the fuel line to the engine is an internal carbon steel line. Carbon steel is the only material that can handle the high pressure and temperature of the fuel line.

Air Fuel Valve

The air valve valve is an air-fuel mixing device and is a non-pneumatically controlled. The valve is an air valve design, allowing a relatively constant pressure drop to flow fuel into the valve from existing air-fuel flow. The valve is mounted in the air intake duct of the throttle control device.

When the engine begins to start, it draws in air with the air valve creating the initial negative pressure begins to build. The negative pressure signal is communicated to the top of the air valve through a vacuum port in the valve assembly. A pressure-flow indicator begins to build when the air valve diaphragm between the air valve sensor (FPS) and the air valve assembly is fully depressed.

any change the secondary diaphragm is down further down forcing the secondary valve open to open valve.

Electronic Throttle Control (ETC)

Engine speed and fuel control are determined by the ECU. Fueling is determined by the ECU software and the throttle position sensor. The ECU is a microcontroller that receives input from the engine. The Electronic Throttle Control device or "throttle body assembly" is connected to the intake manifold of the engine. The electronic throttle control device allows an electronic control system to the throttle body, which the engine's existing electrical signals are sent from the equipment control to the engine ECU when the operator depresses an equipment throttle switch. The ECU then sends an electrical signal to the valve on the electronic throttle control to increase or decrease the angle of the throttle body thus increasing or decreasing the air-fuel flow to the engine.

The electronic throttle control device also incorporates two internal Throttle Position Sensors (TPS) which provide output signals to the ECU as to the location of the throttle shaft and valve. The TPS information is used by the ECU to control speed and fuel control in the engine control.

Engine Control Module

To obtain maximum efficiency from the engine and a control over of the air-fuel ratio, the engine control module is equipped with an onboard computer or engine control unit (ECU). The ECU is a microcontroller which receives input from various sensors that are connected to the engine and fuel system and then outputs control signals to control engine operation.

The specific function of the controller is to maintain "closed loop" fuel control. Closed loop fuel control is accomplished when the exhaust gas oxygen sensor (EGO) mounted in the exhaust system sends a voltage signal to the controller. The controller then calculates any correction that may need to be made to the air-fuel ratio. The controller then outputs signals to the ECU to correct the amount of fuel being supplied to the engine. At the same time the ECU may correct the throttle body position to correct speed and fuel of the engine.

The controller also performs diagnostic functions on the fuel system and controls the operation of the throttle body using an electronic throttle body (ETB) mounted in the throttle control device and the throttle control device. The throttle body is the system as identified by a diagnostic code number in
