

How the laser imager works

The laser imager receives, processes, manages, and prints the images on film. The laser imager has limited storage to hold a small number of digital images. As images are received for printing, they are stored in memory, placed in a sequential print queue, and are printed in order. The laser imager can continue to accept incoming print jobs even if temporarily unable to print (if the film supply is empty, etc).

During normal operation, the laser imager requires very little attention. It prints automatically in response to print requests from the configured image sources. Information sent with the images by the image source, such as film type and size and image quality settings, is applied unless you set the laser imager to override information that comes from the image source.

Print sequence

Each time the laser imager receives a print request, the following print sequence occurs. The blue arrows show the film path.

1. Suction cups in the pickup area lift a single sheet of film out of the supply cartridge and feed the film into the transport rollers.
2. The transport rollers move the film down into the exposure transport area.
3. The film moves down during imaging (as the optics module writes the image onto film), reverses direction at the conclusion of imaging, and then the film moves up into the processor.
4. As the film passes over the processor drum, the heat generated by the drum develops the film.
5. The exit rollers move the developed film to the exit tray.
