

Patriot's Pen Essay

I would tell the founding fathers (everyone who signed the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution) that I like that the Constitution is extremely adaptable through amendments, and that the approval process of amendments is so rigorous and lengthy (First, the amendment is proposed, then it must obtain a two-thirds approval from each house. After that, three-quarters of the states must ratify it, and at last, the amendment is approved by state legislatures or by a special convention held in every state), letting only the constitutional and fair amendments change it. Such safeguards prevent unconstitutional amendments (amendments that break the Constitution's rules) from passing, and from the people complaining about such rules.

There was also much foresight put into the creation of the Constitution. For example, the Bill of Rights allows it to adapt over time, and for the government to be run as the people make it run. This is an excellent adaptation, as amendments can always be proposed so the original Constitution will not need to be re-written, and the people are the ones making the rules that they will follow. In addition, people can depend on these rules, because with the safeguards in place, they do not radically change.

However, there is one thing that I would suggest America's founding fathers improve on. I would say for them to combine the sixth and seventh amendments, as they both relate to trial by jury.

In conclusion, I praise the founding fathers for investing so much work and time into the Constitution, which gave people assurances that they would never have to fear their government, and for the amendments, which made the Constitution adaptable, so people would never have to fear stagnation. The founding fathers also established many safeguards in the Constitution's amendments (which were established to prevent unconstitutional amendments from passing). Thanks to all their efforts and to their foresight, we now are in an independent and just country.
