In industrial robots, there are two types of joints: revolute and prismatic. The revolute joints are the most common and are used to rotate the arm around a fixed axis.

Revolute joints are the most common and are used to rotate the arm around a fixed axis. They are also the most expensive and are the most difficult to maintain.

Prismatic joints are the second most common and are used to move the arm along a fixed axis. They are also the most expensive and are the most difficult to maintain. In some cases, the joints are arranged in a series or parallel configuration. In a series configuration, the joints are arranged in a line and the arm moves in a straight line. In a parallel configuration, the joints are arranged in a parallel line and the arm moves in a parallel line.

There are two types of joints: revolute and prismatic.
