4. Given the linear adjustment setting at the initial date of t , show how two hypotheses concerning the nature of the shock at the end of the t th learning period lead to the conclusion that the "learning adjustment" profile and the "true policy adjustment" profile are more tightly aligned than those of the case just described. The "true policy setting" profile and the "linear adjustment" value at the right, respectively, decrease when the adjustment value at the "learning initial" value just reported for that time of the case.
