4.2.4 Control of Records

Similarly, Clause 4.2.4 demands that an organization must implement a documented procedure to define the controls needed for the identification, storage, protection, retrieval, retention and disposition of records and that these records must remain legible and identifiable throughout their retention period.

This because records are an important organizational asset; they provide the primary route for evidence based verification and traceability, and are able to demonstrate compliance with customer requirements. Records also prove the efficacy of the quality management system.

- Use your records to prove that requirements have been met
- Develop a procedure to control your records (QSP4.2.4)
- Ensure that your records are useable

Records Required By ISO 9001

Implementing a compliant document management system could mean keeping certain records that your organization might not be already keeping. Some of these records may seem a little confusing until you become more familiar with the quality standard.

Of course, you might decide to keep more records than those listed below, if you feel your organization needs them, but as we always preach, keep your system simple. The fewer documents and records you keep, the fewer things that will be audited, and the more time you will have to actually run your business.
