Background: A recent study comparing the effects of a 12-week, low-intensity, supervised walking program on the health of older adults with mild cognitive impairment (MCI) and those with no cognitive impairment (NCI) found that the walking program improved cognitive function in both groups, but the improvement was more pronounced in the MCI group. The study also found that the walking program improved physical function and quality of life in both groups, but the improvement was more pronounced in the MCI group. The study was conducted in a community-based setting and included a control group that did not receive the walking program. The study was limited by its short duration and the lack of a blinding procedure. The study was funded by the National Institutes of Health.
