

EMOTIONAL INTELLIGENCE TEACHER'S NOTES

A. WARNER

1. Which people from the past do you think were great leaders?
2. Are there any current leaders that you think are great leaders?
3. What do you think has made these people great leaders?

B. SHORT PRESENTATION

Tell the students they are each going to give a short presentation on what they think are the qualities of a good leader. Give them five minutes to prepare, and then they each have 2 to 3 minutes to present it to the class (or in smaller groups for larger classes).

C. READING

The students are going to read a shortened version of an article by Daniel Goleman, published in the Harvard Business Review. Distribute the introduction (the first page) to the students. Get them to read it and answer the following questions:

1. Why is emotional intelligence so important in leadership?
2. What specific qualities make up emotional intelligence?
3. What do you think each of these qualities means practically?

D. READING – INFORMATION SHARE

The article continues with a description of each of the four qualities of emotional intelligence. Hand these out to the students, so that each student has a copy of one of the qualities (for larger classes, divide the class into groups of two for this section). The students need to read through their text, and then explain to the other students what that particular quality means. They need to make notes of all the feedback from the students, so that they have all the essential characteristics summarized.

When all the qualities have been covered, get the students to draw a table on the board (or piece of paper), a summary of all the essential points. The companion programs refer to this summary.

E. INTERVIEW

The students are going to assess each other, as though they are doing an emotional intelligence analysis. Give the students five minutes to write down some questions they would ask someone if they were trying to analyze them for, assessing, all four qualities from the article. Their questions could also include scenarios (e.g. What would you do if...?)
