Introduction

Cinema has become an integral part of American popular culture, and as such it can reflect the mindset of the audience, serving as an effective immortalization of the struggles and stories that people of the day held to be important. However, did it always serve that purpose? In America, movies achieved mass popularity in the 1930's, during a period marked by some of the country's most turbulent domestic social changes. An influx of immigration, Prohibition, the subsequent boom of organized crime, and the Great Depression all provided a great deal of subject matter for the social commentary so favored by the movie industry, but did the cinema play the same role in a time when popular culture and the movies had not yet permanently linked themselves to one another?

As the gangster film proved itself to be the defining genre of that first era of massively popular American cinematography (appropriate, given the number of negative social issues
