The Elements of Statistical Learning

During the past decade, there has been an explosion in computational and administrative tools, which have in turn given rise to massive amounts of data in a variety of fields, such as medicine, biology, finance, and marketing. The challenge of understanding these data has led to the development of new tools in the field of statistics and spawned new areas such as data mining, machine learning, and bioinformatics. Many of these tools have common underpinnings, but no single reference with different connections. This book describes the important ideas in these areas in a common conceptual framework. While the approach is statistical, the emphasis is on concepts rather than mathematics. Many examples are given, with a liberal use of color graphics. It should be a valuable resource for statisticians and anyone interested in data mining in context of statistics. The book's coverage is broad, from supervised learning (prediction) to unsupervised learning. The many topics include model selection, support vector machines, classification trees and boosting—the first comprehensive treatment of the topic in one book.

The major new addition features more topics and content in the original, including graphical models, random forests, ensemble methods, least angle regression, ℓ_1 path algorithms for feature selection, cross-validation, sparse discriminant, and spectral clustering. There is also a chapter on methods for “web” data (e.g. PageRank) as well as including multiple testing and time-dependent data.

Trevor Hastie, Robert Tibshirani, and Jerome Friedman are professors of statistics at Stanford University. They are prominent researchers in this area, and Tibshirani developed graphical lasso and random forests, while Hastie created several of the most successful machine learning algorithms and contributed to SVM, PLS, and several principal components methods. Tibshirani proposed the lasso and is co-author of the best-selling Statistical Learning in Biophysics. This is the first volume of more than twenty books including GLMNET, Support Vector Machines, and Gradient Boosting.
