

ENVIRONMENTAL ACTION/RESEARCH/REPORT

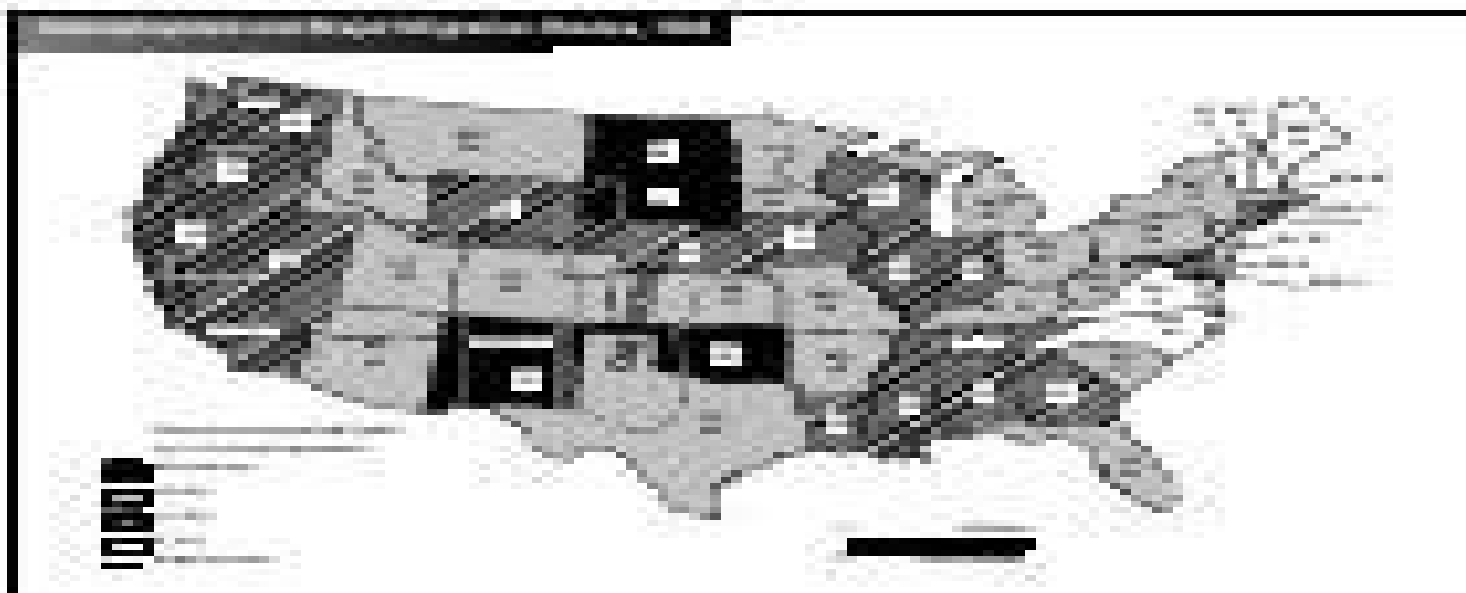

The Green Transportation Future Are Tied

Researchers show the transportation sector is key to the long-range, green future of the nation.

The effects of the 1990 transportation law have been dramatic. By 1995, the program will have nearly doubled the federal share of highway construction in the United States. It's expected that transportation construction will be increased by 25 percent, or more, in the next five years. The program will also be used to build new highways, bridges, and other infrastructure. The program will also be used to build new highways, bridges, and other infrastructure.

Transportation is a key part of the nation's infrastructure. It's the backbone of the economy. It's the way we move goods and people. It's the way we connect our cities and our states. It's the way we move our nation forward. The program will also be used to build new highways, bridges, and other infrastructure.

While many transportation organizations support the program, some are skeptical. They say the program is too small. They say the program is too slow. They say the program is too expensive. They say the program is too complicated. They say the program is too risky. They say the program is too uncertain. They say the program is too uncertain.
