Abstract

These two strategies produce results that are, at best, mixed. For example, a number of empirical studies have shown that the use of a "no-harm" policy can lead to a reduction in the number of deaths and injuries from fires. However, the same studies have also shown that the use of a "no-harm" policy can lead to an increase in the number of deaths and injuries from fires. This is because the use of a "no-harm" policy can lead to a reduction in the number of deaths and injuries from fires, but it can also lead to an increase in the number of deaths and injuries from fires. This is because the use of a "no-harm" policy can lead to a reduction in the number of deaths and injuries from fires, but it can also lead to an increase in the number of deaths and injuries from fires.

Abstract Eighty-five young English speakers were asked to read a list of 100 words, each preceded by a short sentence. The words were divided into two groups: 50 words that were preceded by a sentence that was related to the word, and 50 words that were preceded by a sentence that was unrelated to the word. The results showed that the words preceded by a related sentence were read faster than the words preceded by an unrelated sentence. This result is consistent with the idea that the words are read faster when the sentence is related to the word.
