

Striped bass (Morone saxatilis) The increasingly popular fish has grown to over 3 feet long, weigh 40 pounds, and live up to 10 years. Recently, habitat loss has restricted populations of striped bass in Connecticut, requiring anglers to fish farther from shore in the Hudson River.

White perch (Morone americana) A close relative of the striped bass, this smaller species typically grows to 18 inches, weigh up to 3 pounds, and is available for anglers from shore and boats as it is found in a variety of habitats.

Bluefish (Menticolus caeruleus) The highly sought game fish that may grow to over 3 feet long and weigh more than 100 pounds inhabits the Thames River in summer. A predatory fish with razor-sharp teeth, bluefish can chase the surface of the water as they feed on smaller fish.

American eel (Anguilla rostrata) The unusual fish with a eel-like body and no continuous dorsal fin is the first listed to grow in mud and can grow up to 3 feet long. It grows in only one place in the world—the long grass for mudflats of the West Indies.

American sand darter (Ammocetes americanus) Growing up to 3 feet long, this darter, a schooling fish in the Connecticut River, is recognized for its value as a cultural food source. Historically, the Connecticut River was one of the more productive and dense in New England.

Weakfish (Cynoscion regalis) A river herring that may grow to 12 inches long, this fish is an important source of food for striped bass and other game fish. Many species of wildlife also depend on healthy stream populations for source of food.
