SECTION A: Text A – “Swimming with Nightmares”

50 marks

Peter Benchley is famous for writing the novel “Jaws”, which describes a group of men to capture a killer great white shark. “Swimming with Nightmares” is an extract from a short story by Benchley about his own experience of swimming with a great white shark.

Swimming with Nightmares from Shark Trouble by Peter Benchley

1. I had expected to find silence under water, but my breath roared in a tunnel, as I inhaled through my regulator, and my exhalations bubbled, like bubbles being blown through a straw in a drink. Waves slapped the fitting top hatch of the cage, the welded joints creaked with every turn and twist. When the rope that tethered the cage to the boat drew taut, there was a rattling, rattling noise and the clank of the steel ring scraping against its anchor.
2. Then I saw movement. Something was coming against the glass. Something dark. It was there and gone and there again, not circling as I'd thought it would, not circling, but coming straight at me, slowly, deliberately, undisturbed, emerging from the mist.
3. I stopped breathing—not intentionally, reflexively, as I, by suspending my breath I could suspend all animation—saw the hammering in my ears. I wasn't afraid, exactly; I had been afraid before, on the boat, but by now I had passed through fear into a realm of excitement, something like shocked disbelief.
There it is! Feel the pressure in the water as the body moves through it. The size of it! My God, the size!
4. The animal kept coming, and I could see all of it: the pointed snout, the steel grey upper body in stark contrast with the milky white undercarriage, the symmetry of the pectoral fins, the awful knife blade of the dorsal fin, the powerful, deliberate back-and-forth scythe-like tail. It propelled the enormous body toward me, steadily, inexorably, as if it had no need for speed, for it knew it could not be stopped.
5. I lost sight of the animal. Its black eyes registered neither interest nor excitement. As it came a few feet from me, it opened its mouth and I saw, first, the lower jaw crowded with jagged, needle-pointed teeth, and then—as the upper jaw detached from the skull and dropped downward—the huge, triangular cutting teeth, each side serrated like a saw blade.
