1. The first step in the process of developing a national strategy for the environment is to identify the key environmental issues that are most pressing for the country. This is done by conducting a comprehensive assessment of the country's environmental situation, taking into account the natural resources, the population, the economy, and the social and cultural context. This assessment should be done in a participatory manner, involving all sectors of society and all levels of government.
2. The second step is to set priorities for action. This is done by identifying the most serious environmental problems and the sectors of the economy that are most responsible for these problems. The priorities should be based on the assessment of the environmental situation and the country's development goals.
3. The third step is to develop a national strategy for the environment. This is done by formulating a set of principles and objectives that will guide the country's environmental policy. The strategy should be based on the assessment of the environmental situation and the country's development goals.
