

ANSWERS AND EXPLANATIONS

Each time a person enters the room, the computer generates a number and then asks randomly whether they should be given points. It counts the number of times. The data were not plotted until the end of the study, but that presentation was an effective way to allow the group to see what was happening. This study would frequently present the students a visual representation.

Although the researchers were not explicitly aware of the need to use the graph-oriented, subject-matter knowledge feature, they might consider developing the computer program that would allow them to make the problem appealing to the children by perhaps making them think the problem was fun.

The authors took a more sophisticated approach to collect more data and to present it better for the students. The data were being collected through the use of a computer. The problem involving the two randomly selected students would have been the same if the students had been selected manually. However, using computers allows finding the data quickly and does not require entering them through handwriting.

One might bring out the point that having the data being collected and then the results being presented and the data being presented and being presented was really simple.

The data are a good example of a computer program that is simple. This means you are presenting the data in a way that is simple and the data are presented in a way that is simple.

The authors also showed how the data were collected.
