Starting this week, visitors could take the walkway that followed a canal, built with a rubber-wooden grate, through swamps and mangroves to the island's lagoon. But the rubber-wood grates, the two main components of the walkway, rotted and broke. The island's main attraction, the mangrove forest, was also being destroyed. Some were "digging for holes" that damaged the roots of mangrove trees, while others were pulling the mangrove trees out, then selling some of the logs, according to the report. The report also says that the mangrove forest is being destroyed by other factors, such as logging and fishing.
