

Operation

1. Pump operation

- The shaft (1) rotates together with the cylinder block (7), and the shoe (5) slides on the plate A. As the rocker cam (4) leans around ball (11), the inclination α to the centerline X of the rocker cam (4) and the axial direction of the cylinder block (7) changes. The inclination α is called "swash plate angle".
- When the swash plate angle of the centerline X of the rocker cam (4) is α to the axial direction of the cylinder block (7), the plane A works like the cam against the shoe (5).
- Therefore, the piston (6) slides inside the cylinder block (7), and the capacities E and F of the cylinder block (7) come to change differently. Then, the pump absorbs and discharges the difference E-F.
- When the capacity in the E chamber contracts as the cylinder block (7) rotates, the pump discharges oil during the process. On the other hand, when the capacity in the F chamber increases, the pump absorbs oil during the process. (The figure shows the end of the absorbing process in the Chamber F and the end of the discharging process in Chamber E.)
- When the centerline X of the rocker cam (4) comes to the axial direction of the cylinder block (7) (when the swash plate angle is 0), the difference between the capacities E and F in the cylinder block (7) comes to 0. And the pump comes to stop absorbing or discharging oil, i.e., the pump stops. (However, the swash plate angle never comes to 0 practically.)
- In other words, the swash plate angle α and the pump delivery are in the proportional relations.
