For the first time, a study has shown that the use of a computerized decision support system (DSS) can improve the accuracy of a physician's diagnosis of a patient with a heart attack. The study, conducted by researchers at the University of California, San Diego, found that the DSS, which was designed to help physicians make decisions about the best treatment for a patient with a heart attack, improved the accuracy of the physician's diagnosis by 10% compared to a control group. The study also found that the DSS reduced the time it took the physician to make a diagnosis by 15%.

Persons with a history of alcoholism are at an increased risk of developing a variety of psychiatric disorders, including depression, anxiety disorders, and personality disorders. The purpose of this study was to examine the prevalence of psychiatric disorders in a sample of alcoholics and to determine the relationship between these disorders and the history of alcoholism. The study included 100 individuals with a history of alcoholism, who were interviewed and assessed for various psychiatric disorders. The results showed that the prevalence of psychiatric disorders was significantly higher in the sample of alcoholics compared to a control group. The most common disorders were depression, anxiety disorders, and personality disorders. The study also found that the history of alcoholism was a significant predictor of the development of these disorders. These findings suggest that individuals with a history of alcoholism should be closely monitored for the development of psychiatric disorders, and that early intervention and treatment may be necessary to prevent the progression of these disorders.
