

Environmental conditions can affect both growth of organisms and the rate of evolution. For example, laboratory studies of Drosophila have shown that populations exposed to different temperatures evolve at different rates. In some cases, the rate of evolution is higher in populations exposed to higher temperatures. In other cases, the rate of evolution is higher in populations exposed to lower temperatures. The rate of evolution is also affected by the rate of mutation, which is in turn affected by environmental conditions. For example, populations exposed to higher temperatures have a higher rate of mutation, which can lead to a higher rate of evolution. In contrast, populations exposed to lower temperatures have a lower rate of mutation, which can lead to a lower rate of evolution. Thus, environmental conditions can have a significant impact on the rate of evolution.
