These researchers have investigated the effects of "regulation" (i.e., time intervals) on memory and comprehension of problems. They suggest different forms of scheduling, including very short study intervals (e.g., 10-15 sec) and increasing study intervals to more realistic intervals (e.g., 10 min) between trials. All participants were the same (female psychology majors), and comprehension of the problems was highly consistent across groups. They also investigated the effects of "regulation" (i.e., time intervals) on comprehension of problems. They found that comprehension of the problems was higher for the 10-min group than for the 10-sec group. They also found that the 10-min group had higher comprehension of the problems than the 10-sec group. They also found that the 10-min group had higher comprehension of the problems than the 10-sec group.
