History of finger prints

It is believed that the Chinese were the first to use finger prints to identify individuals without realizing that how unique these marks were. There are documents that were signed three thousand years ago by Chinese culture using finger prints.

William Herschel was an English civil servant who worked at a tea company in India and his job was to recruit Indians to harvest tea, to do this he had to make them sign a contract, the problem was that they didn't know how to write their names, so he had them signed by putting their right hand in ink and pressing it to the paper.

It wasn't until the year 1892 that Francis Galton (considered the god father of finger prints) wrote the book "Finger Prints" in which he discussed the anatomy of finger prints and suggested methods for recording them. He was the first individual who came up with the three classifications of finger prints: the loops, whorls, and arches which I will talk about in later on. He also laid down the laws of finger prints which say that no two finger prints are the same and that a finger print of an individual remain unchanged.

In the early 19's the US began to use finger prints as an efficient way to identify individuals followed by the whole world until now. Nowadays we use finger prints in almost every aspect of our lives that need authentication and identification from unlocking our smart phones to identifying victims and criminal in a police investigation.

How is it that every one of us has a unique finger print?

Finger print is considered a very efficient way to identify individuals because every individual has his own unique finger print. In fact even identical twins who have the same DNA have different finger prints and the reason why is that finger prints are created while the baby is in his mother's womb. The pressure of the fluid inside the womb on the surface of the hands and finger tips influences the formation of patterns and with so many factors which determine the shapes of these patterns every ones finger prints are unique.
