By Dan Ellis Newlin

1. Chloroplasts allow green plants to make their own food using light energy and carbon dioxide from the atmosphere. Chloroplasts are found in green plants and some algae. They contain a green pigment called chlorophyll which captures light energy from the sun. This energy is used to make glucose from carbon dioxide and water. The glucose is then used by the plant for energy and growth. Chloroplasts are found in the mesophyll cells of the leaf. They are surrounded by a double membrane and contain a fluid called stroma. Inside the stroma are stacks of green discs called thylakoids. These are where the light-dependent reactions of photosynthesis take place. The thylakoids are joined together to form grana. The fluid inside the thylakoids is called thylakoid fluid. The grana are surrounded by a fluid called stroma. The stroma is where the sugar phosphate cycle takes place. The sugar phosphate cycle is a series of reactions that convert sugar phosphate into glucose and then into pyruvate. Pyruvate is then used for energy and growth. The sugar phosphate cycle is a key part of photosynthesis and is essential for the plant to survive.
