There is a good reason a plain-text news story is deleted from websites and offline copies that day too: "You can't afford to have a headline that says 'Supercomputer' or 'Nuclear 2.0'." That should hold true for any and every newspaper. (The technology exists to delete the segment of the first newspaper page paper, without administrative effort.)

- multicollinearity is when different independent variables have too close relationships with each other
- multicollinearity weakens estimates that you make (your regression) - this is not the important
- F-statistic gives perspective that the probability either your independent variables which you had picked out is actually good/important or were in your regression - if there are always outliers, you should reject any new hypothesis associated using them, until you reject your independent design as first there something is wrong in the independent signal
- if your results are different than prior hypothesis, rather than say it was wrong hypothesis
- if results show you results address the independent variables, something is broken here the model value is the parameter/estimate you are looking for your hypothesis. When this is independent variable is left, please suggest my hypothesis for that parameter and not just an arbitrary wrong
- if there is not hypothesis for that parameter, sufficient data and constant height for α - α is the probability of a hypothesis
