

ANSWERS AND EXPLANATIONS

Each time a person enters the room, the computer generates a number and then randomly selects a name from the names placed in bowls for each group. The name that is called reads the problem, and that person then uses an alternative to the problem to help understand how to solve it. Each member frequently shares the answer to their assignment.

Afterward, the class discusses each set with details, and the class reads the group-generated, edited, and simplified version. The average number of assignments for each group was about five to twelve. The problem-solving strategy for each problem was often clearly stated and well thought out.

The students took a break and completed a project for the next week. They had to create a poster for the Museum. The poster, usually showing three related ideas, was about the importance of the problem-solving strategy for each assignment. Students were encouraged to show how they solved the problem. The poster was then displayed in the hallway.

After a few days, the students and their parents were given a project to do. The project was to create a poster for the Museum. The poster, usually showing three related ideas, was about the importance of the problem-solving strategy for each assignment. Students were encouraged to show how they solved the problem. The poster was then displayed in the hallway.

The next day, a new problem was given to the class. The problem was to create a poster for the Museum. The poster, usually showing three related ideas, was about the importance of the problem-solving strategy for each assignment. Students were encouraged to show how they solved the problem. The poster was then displayed in the hallway.

The students were given a new problem to solve.

The next day, a new problem was given to the class.
