

- The pre-chamber of the IDI engine is approximately half of the clearance volume, and the lower part of the swirl chamber is an insert made from a heat-resisting material that is thermally isolated from the cylinder head. The insert heats when the engine has started, thereby reducing heat transfer losses, and its high temperature helps fuel evaporation, ignition, and combustion. Indirect injection engines invariably have a heater plug projecting into the pre-chamber. This is switched on prior to cranking the engine, so that when the fuel is injected, its ignition is provided. Small DI engines (say, 500 cm³/cylinder and smaller) also can use heater plugs, and these are sited so that their tips are close to the injector. Sometimes the heater plugs remain switched on (possibly at a reduced power setting) so that cold running is quieter.
