Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether there were differences in the prevalence of self-reported depression among men and women who had been exposed to violence during childhood compared to those who had not been exposed to violence during childhood. Data from the National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health (Add Health) were used. Results showed that exposure to violence during childhood was associated with higher rates of self-reported depression among both men and women. However, the association between exposure to violence during childhood and self-reported depression was stronger for women than for men.
