Abstract: Salmonella enteritidis has been the most common serotype isolated from humans in the United States since 1990. The purpose of this study was to determine the prevalence of Salmonella enteritidis in retail chicken meat and to compare the results with those of a national study. A total of 1,000 retail chicken meat samples were collected from 100 different retail outlets in the United States. The results of this study are compared with those of a national study conducted in 1998.
