Research and Methodology for Interior Designers

Robert Haddad

Professor of Design, FAAD, Notre Dame University, Lebanon.

Abstract

Every design is a hypothesis and a practical experiment. By its very nature, design aims at solving problems by intervening in a particular way. Both the design hypothesis and intervention need to be articulated and together they are the foundation for research. Many designers may find it difficult to verbalize design because much of the design process is intuitive and non-conscious, relying on metaphors and implied knowledge rather than explicit and logical thinking. The present paper intends to shed some light on the necessity of research as an integral part of the design profession. Also this paper addresses designers with the possible approaches to methodologies and techniques in the practice of interior design.

1. Introduction

Today and more then ever before clients are developing a “show me” attitude and demanding justifications for design decisions.

Clients are now looking for designers who have strong knowledge and background in research methodologies for testing design outcomes. They also developed the so-called performance-based contracting where the architect/designer is not paid in full until after post-occupancy assessment. What clients wanted from an interior designer fifteen or twenty years ago is different from what they are looking for today. At present, clients look first at the designer’s experience with their type of project, then at firm’s experience. They next evaluate the ability to complete the project on time and within a set budget, and the accuracy in making estimates and specifications. Also down the list of their considerations is the kind of design work the firm does, the firm’s
