MULTI-SITE FAMILY STUDY ON INCARCERATION, PARENTING AND PARTNERING

Change in Couple Relationships Before, During, and After Incarceration

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

The MFS-IP study offers a unique opportunity to examine change in couple relationships over time among a sub-sample of 641 heterosexual couples who were in an intimate relationship at the time the study started. All of the male partners in this analysis were incarcerated in state prison when the study started and released before the study ended.

- After the male partner's release from prison, fewer couples defined their relationships as intimate, lived together, or were exclusive with one another than during the period of incarceration.
- Two common factors shaped whether participants defined their relationships as intimate, lived together, or were exclusive with one another after release: stronger fidelity attitudes and behaviors, and greater relationship happiness during incarceration.
- Other factors that were associated with one or more of these three relationship outcomes after release included: longer relationship duration, being married, having children together, more contact during incarceration, and satisfaction with help received to maintain contact during incarceration.
- Length of the male partner's incarceration, participation in relationship education, and baseline communication skills did not appear to affect whether participants defined their relationships as intimate, lived together, or were exclusive with one another after release.
