In figure 7 you can see various depositional landforms that have been created at different stages. The most prominent landforms you can see are spits and bars.
As the headland is worn away, rock is deposited by the low energy waves to create these landforms. Over time more sediment, sand and rock build up to form new land.
As the waves hit the headland erosional processes such as hydraulic action and abrasion wear away the rock. Hydraulic action sees the water forced into cracks in the rock and overtime this opens up to caves and arches. When the sediment and rocks are thrown against the cliff by the sea this also causes erosion, and this is known as abrasion.
Transportation processes such as traction and saltation, where large rocks and small pebbles are moved along the seabed, help create bars and levees you can see in figure 7. These features change over time depending on the tide and types of waves.
The constant wind will also contribute to the shape of the headland. High exposed areas can be weakened by strong winds and storms and therefore break off to create slip off slopes.
Erosional processes continue to wear away into the base of the cliff as well as freeze-thaw weathering also weakening the top of the arch, therefore leading to the arches collapsing. This leaves a stack of detached rock.
In figure 7 you see that this is at low tide and when at high tide you cannot see the landforms. As they are underwater the majority of the time the water erodes the rock through underwater currents and processes such as solution and attrition.
Erosional processes will eventually create a wave cut notch at the base of the stack, which would then lead to the stack collapse. When this happens a small stump of land remains.
In figure 7 you can clearly see 3 stacks of land which were created by collapsing arches. The visible arches will also lead to separate stacks of land and over time will reduce the headland found at Old Harrys Rocks.
