Abstract—The importance of environmental conditions, the social structure of fish, and particularly the social organization of groupers, Gnathypops, is well known in aquaculture. Groupers are cultured both in semi-intensive and intensive systems, ranging from earthen ponds to recirculating aquaculture systems. However, the social organization of groupers in these systems is not well understood. This study examined the social organization of groupers in earthen ponds and recirculating aquaculture systems. The results showed that groupers in earthen ponds formed a social hierarchy, while groupers in recirculating aquaculture systems did not. The results also showed that groupers in earthen ponds had a higher survival rate than groupers in recirculating aquaculture systems. These findings suggest that the social organization of groupers is an important factor to consider in aquaculture.
