

How is 'Inspector' presented in AIC?

In the morality play An Inspector Calls, the character of the Inspector is used as a constant by Priestley to be the mouthpiece for the socialist ideas he presents throughout the play reinforcing the key theme of social responsibility.

Priestley purposefully shapes the character of Inspector Goole to be a mysterious, almost supernatural figure to not distract from the actions of the Birling and to provide the audience with a constant figure unaffected by emotion ~~and~~ the events and revelations throughout the play. Goole's omniscient presentation through his in-depth knowledge encourages the other characters to reveal all but also encourages the audience to question whether the Inspector is a supernatural, possibly religious force set to force the upper classes to understand the consequences of their sins. This idea is compounded by the ambiguity around the name 'Goole' which not only connotes the idea of a phantom - like the ghost which exists purely as a sign of someone's imagination - ~~perhaps~~ perhaps implying that the Inspector's questioning is from a moral conscience causing the characters to see the error of their ways and move towards a more righteous, more socialist view. This ambiguity would ~~leave~~ ^{cause} the audience to examine their own behaviour and take actions to avoid any potential socialist supernatural activities.
