Short Answer

16. translation; cytoplasm
17. Structure 1 is an amino acid, which will form a peptide bond with another other amino acid during the translation process, forming protein.
18. 4; UAC
19. Ribosome; the small ribosomal unit binds to mRNA in the cytoplasm. The binding attracts a tRNA with methionine to the start codon. Then the large ribosomal unit joins in. The ribosome pulls the mRNA through, adding amino acids, and forms peptide bonds between the amino acids.
20. Sample answer: The diagram would show mRNA leaving the nucleus, where transcription and mRNA processing took place. It would show the amino acids chains getting longer as translation progressed. It also would show tRNA leaving the ribosome after translation to collect more free-floating amino acids. Finally, it would show the ribosome encountering a stop codon, the peptide strand being released, and the ribosome disassembling.

21. frameshift mutation, insertion of uracil
22. The reading frame is thrown off because all of the nucleotides are shifted to the right. This change will result in codons that code for different amino acids.
23. Sample answer: It would probably have a lesser effect on the organism than a frameshift mutation, because an incorrect amino acid might have little effect on a protein if it has about the same size and the same polarity as the original amino acid or if it is far from an active site.
24. Yes, if the error occurred in a germ cell, the offspring could be affected.
25. Yes, this mutation could be caused by U/V light, industrial chemicals, or pesticides.
