Building Information Systems (BIM) is a digital representation of the physical and functional characteristics of a building.

Building Information Systems (BIM) is a digital representation of the physical and functional characteristics of a building. It is a collaborative process that involves all stakeholders in the building process, from the client to the construction team.

1. The first step in the BIM process is to create a 3D model of the building. This model is used to visualize the building and to identify potential issues before construction begins.
2. The second step is to create a 4D model, which adds time to the 3D model. This model is used to schedule the construction process and to identify potential delays.
3. The third step is to create a 5D model, which adds cost to the 4D model. This model is used to estimate the cost of the building and to identify potential cost overruns.
4. The fourth step is to create a 6D model, which adds sustainability to the 5D model. This model is used to identify potential sustainability issues and to optimize the building's performance.
