

Abstract

The purpose of this study was to investigate the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary adults. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting and involved 30 participants who were randomly assigned to either a training or control group. The training group performed a combination of aerobic and strength training exercises, while the control group remained sedentary. Data were collected at baseline and at the end of the 12-week period.

Results showed that the training group experienced significant improvements in cardiovascular fitness, muscle strength, and body composition compared to the control group. Additionally, the training group reported lower levels of stress and improved mood. These findings suggest that a 12-week training program can have positive effects on both physical and psychological health in sedentary adults.

Introduction

Sedentary lifestyle is a major public health concern, as it is associated with an increased risk of chronic diseases such as heart disease, diabetes, and obesity. Physical inactivity also contributes to mental health issues, including depression and anxiety. Therefore, promoting physical activity and exercise is a key strategy for improving overall health and well-being. This study aims to evaluate the effectiveness of a 12-week training program in improving physical and psychological health in sedentary adults.

Methods

Participants

Thirty sedentary adults, aged 18 to 65, were recruited for the study. They were randomly assigned to either a training group (n=15) or a control group (n=15). All participants provided informed consent before participating in the study.

The training group performed a 12-week program consisting of three sessions per week. Each session included 30 minutes of aerobic exercise (e.g., walking, jogging, or cycling) and 30 minutes of strength training (e.g., resistance band exercises, bodyweight exercises, or free weights).
