

ANSWERS AND EXPLANATIONS

Each time a person enters the room, the computer generates a number and then randomly selects a name from the names placed in bowls for each group. The name that is called reads the problem, and that person then solves the problem. A new problem is then presented and the person that has read that problem randomly selects the answer to that problem.

After the 10 problems are all completed, each is read again. The group that has the highest number of correct answers for average scores is designated the winning group and will select the next problem to be presented. According to the rules of the program, reading each problem and selecting the answer is a random event, and each person is guaranteed to read through each problem.

The authors took a more sophisticated approach to randomizing which person will be selected to read the problem. For each reading of the problem, the computer generated a random number between 0 and 100. The person reading the problem selected the answer that was closest to the generated number. The person reading the problem was then randomly selected to read the next problem. This method guaranteed that each person would read through each problem.

After all 10 problems had been read, the group that had the highest number of correct answers was designated the winning group. The group that had the highest number of correct answers was designated the winning group.
