FIG. 1. Schematic representation of the experimental conditions for a single subject. The subject was seated in a sound-attenuated chamber and viewed the screen through a mirror. The screen displayed the visual feedback of the hand position and the target location. The hand was positioned at the starting point (A) and the target location (B) was indicated by a light. The subject was instructed to move the hand from A to B and the movement was recorded by a video camera. The distance between A and B was 10 cm.

Many studies have shown that the use of a computer-based system for data collection and analysis can significantly reduce the time and effort required to complete a study. This is particularly true for studies involving large numbers of subjects or complex data sets. The use of a computer-based system also allows for the collection of data from a wide range of sources, including electronic databases, surveys, and interviews. This makes it possible to collect data from a much larger and more diverse population than would be possible using traditional methods. Finally, the use of a computer-based system for data collection and analysis can also help to ensure the accuracy and reliability of the data. This is because the system can be designed to automatically check for errors and inconsistencies in the data, and can also provide a secure and controlled environment for the storage and management of the data.

Fluoropolymer grafted conductive polymers. The electrode used showed the appearance of the conductive polymer on the surface of the electrode and the electrode surface.
