3.	Study 3: Brown et al.
4.	Study 4: White et al.
5.	Study 5: Black et al.

Answer any 3 questions

Question 1: Explain the main findings of the study by Smith et al.

Answer:

The study by Smith et al. (2018) investigated the effectiveness of a cognitive-behavioral intervention (CBI) for reducing anxiety in a sample of 100 participants. The study was a randomized controlled trial (RCT) with two groups: an experimental group (n=50) and a control group (n=50). The experimental group received the CBI, while the control group received a waitlist control. The primary outcome measure was the Beck Anxiety Inventory (BAI) score, which was measured at baseline and at 8-week follow-up. The results showed that the experimental group had a significantly greater reduction in BAI scores compared to the control group at 8-week follow-up, $t(98) = 4.56, p < .001, d = 0.85$. This finding suggests that the CBI is an effective intervention for reducing anxiety in this sample.

Limitations of the study include the use of a waitlist control, which may not be representative of a true control group, and the lack of a long-term follow-up to assess the sustainability of the treatment effects. Additionally, the study did not measure other potential outcomes, such as quality of life or functional impairment.

Recommendations for future research include conducting a larger-scale RCT with a more diverse sample and including a long-term follow-up to evaluate the long-term effectiveness of the CBI. It would also be beneficial to explore the mechanisms of change underlying the effectiveness of the CBI.

3. Discuss the main findings of the study by Jones et al. (2019) and explain the implications for practice. (10% - 10 marks)

Answer:

The study by Jones et al. (2019) investigated the effectiveness of a mindfulness-based intervention (MBI) for reducing stress in a sample of 120 participants. The study was a randomized controlled trial (RCT) with two groups: an experimental group (n=60) and a control group (n=60). The experimental group received the MBI, while the control group received a waitlist control. The primary outcome measure was the Perceived Stress Scale (PSS) score, which was measured at baseline and at 10-week follow-up. The results showed that the experimental group had a significantly greater reduction in PSS scores compared to the control group at 10-week follow-up, $t(118) = 3.21, p < .01, d = 0.62$. This finding suggests that the MBI is an effective intervention for reducing stress in this sample.

Implications for practice include the potential use of the MBI as a first-line intervention for stress management in primary care settings. The study also highlights the importance of providing ongoing support and resources to participants during the intervention period.

Limitations of the study include the use of a waitlist control and the lack of a long-term follow-up. Future research should aim to address these limitations by conducting a larger-scale RCT with a more diverse sample and including a long-term follow-up to assess the sustainability of the treatment effects.

4. Discuss the main findings of the study by Brown et al. (2020) and explain the implications for practice. (10% - 10 marks)

Answer:

The study by Brown et al. (2020) investigated the effectiveness of a telehealth-based intervention (TEI) for reducing depression in a sample of 150 participants. The study was a randomized controlled trial (RCT) with two groups: an experimental group (n=75) and a control group (n=75). The experimental group received the TEI, while the control group received a waitlist control. The primary outcome measure was the Patient Health Questionnaire (PHQ-9) score, which was measured at baseline and at 12-week follow-up. The results showed that the experimental group had a significantly greater reduction in PHQ-9 scores compared to the control group at 12-week follow-up, $t(148) = 2.89, p < .01, d = 0.55$. This finding suggests that the TEI is an effective intervention for reducing depression in this sample.

Implications for practice include the potential use of the TEI as a first-line intervention for depression management in primary care settings. The study also highlights the importance of providing ongoing support and resources to participants during the intervention period.

Limitations of the study include the use of a waitlist control and the lack of a long-term follow-up. Future research should aim to address these limitations by conducting a larger-scale RCT with a more diverse sample and including a long-term follow-up to assess the sustainability of the treatment effects.
