

Earthquake Swarms

Why do we get thousands of earthquakes in some areas?

Observations: Higher number swarms are found near hydrothermal vents in geologically most tectonically uncomplexed oceanic environments.

Earthquakes occur in many places throughout the world. Stronger plate tectonics are (1) subduction zones, where subducting plates create (2) transform faults, where plates slide past each other, and (3) divergent plate boundaries, where plates move apart. Earth's (4) transform plate boundaries happen mostly in the ocean. Earthquakes occur at the plate (5) junction lines, where plates meet. Subduction zones occur at plate boundaries where one (6) convergent plate subducts beneath another. Plate divergent earthquakes are typically (7) shallow because the plates are still close to the surface. Earthquakes that occur along (8) transform plate boundaries have a maximum depth of (9) 10 km, whereas subduction zone earthquakes have a maximum depth of (10) 700 km. Earthquakes that occur along (11) divergent plate boundaries are a variable depth but (12) shallow earthquakes. However, Earth's oceanic plates (13) are rigid and (14) can break apart. An example of subducting plate tectonics is the (15) Mid-Atlantic Ridge, a convergent plate boundary.

The collision of Earth's oceanic plates creates huge (16) transform faults, such as the San Andreas in California. Along subduction boundaries, the one moving plate subducts underneath the other, they create the (17) great thrust faults along the (18) plate boundary of subduction. These areas have strong (19) hydrothermal vents, earthquakes occur from the faulting structures of (20) plates as well as plate-subduction zone.

Observations: Like other tectonic, an oceanic plate is rigid.
