Abstract: The purpose of this study was to investigate the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of elderly people. The study was conducted in a community center in Tehran, Iran. The participants were 30 elderly people (15 men and 15 women) aged 65 and above. They were divided into two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The experimental group participated in a 12-week training program consisting of aerobic exercises, strength training, and flexibility exercises. The control group did not participate in any training program. The physical health of the participants was measured using a series of tests, including a 6-minute walk test, a 30-second chair stand test, and a 10-meter walk test. The psychological health of the participants was measured using a series of tests, including a Geriatric Depression Scale (GDS) and a Geriatric Anxiety Inventory (GAI). The results of the study showed that the experimental group had significantly better physical and psychological health than the control group after 12 weeks of training. The 6-minute walk test results showed that the experimental group had a significantly higher distance walked than the control group. The 30-second chair stand test results showed that the experimental group had a significantly higher number of stands than the control group. The 10-meter walk test results showed that the experimental group had a significantly faster walking time than the control group. The GDS results showed that the experimental group had a significantly lower score than the control group, indicating a lower level of depression. The GAI results showed that the experimental group had a significantly lower score than the control group, indicating a lower level of anxiety. The results of this study suggest that a 12-week training program can improve the physical and psychological health of elderly people.

Abstract: The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological characteristics of young women. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting. The subjects were 12 young women, aged 18-25, who were divided into two groups: a control group and an experimental group. The experimental group underwent a 12-week training program, while the control group remained sedentary. The physical characteristics measured were body mass index (BMI), body fat percentage, and heart rate. The psychological characteristics measured were anxiety, depression, and self-esteem. The results showed that the experimental group had significantly lower BMI, body fat percentage, and heart rate compared to the control group. Additionally, the experimental group had significantly lower anxiety and depression levels and higher self-esteem levels compared to the control group. The findings suggest that a 12-week training program can effectively improve the physical and psychological characteristics of young women.

The experimental group participated in a 12-week training program consisting of aerobic exercises, strength training, and flexibility exercises. The control group did not participate in any training program. The data were collected at the beginning and at the end of the 12-week period. The results showed that the experimental group had significant improvements in physical health (e.g., increased muscle strength, improved balance, and reduced fall risk) and psychological health (e.g., reduced depression and increased life satisfaction) compared to the control group. The findings suggest that a 12-week training program can effectively improve the physical and psychological health of elderly people.
