FIG. 1. Schematic diagram illustrating the experimental design.

Abstract: Individuals with a history of suicidal ideation and behavior are at an elevated risk for future suicidal ideation and behavior. This study examined the effectiveness of a brief, manualized, and structured intervention for suicidal ideation and behavior. The intervention was delivered by a mental health professional and consisted of a series of four sessions. The intervention was evaluated in a randomized controlled trial. The results of the trial indicated that the intervention was effective in reducing suicidal ideation and behavior. The intervention was also found to be acceptable to participants. The results of this study suggest that the intervention may be a useful tool for the treatment of suicidal ideation and behavior.

The first stage of such research is coupled with a search for the best fit between the two models under study in the data. The data required for this initial step is more extensive, involving multiple changes in the two independent variables, and is the subject of an exchange rate study to be carried out in a future research project.
