Abstract

Counselor Educators providing instruction to counselors-in-training need to have a variety of activities and assignments to support the development of an ethical mindset. Because counselors face ethical dilemmas regularly, it is important that graduate programs provide a strong foundation for new counselors to identify ethical issues and take appropriate action. There are no uniform or standard approaches for teaching counseling graduate students how and when to apply ethical codes and related principles, however, they are expected to be competent in the subject matter upon graduation. This article outlines a method for increasing participation in ethics courses and enhancing sensitivity to ethical issues through the grand jury mock trial classroom activity. To encourage classroom implementation, step-by-step instructions are provided.

Keywords

counselor education, ethics, ethical dilemmas, mock trial

Introduction

Being familiar with the American Counseling Association Code of Ethical Standards (2014) is essential to ensuring that counselors-in-training and postgraduate counselors represent the profession in a way that advances it and ensures the protection of the general public. A required component of any graduate training program in mental health and therapeutic counseling is the completion of a course or integrated set of courses focused on professional ethics. Topics in these courses range from addressing informed consent, respect for privacy, and personal values to issues of counselor competency. Although there is no one uniform way to teach ethics courses, graduate programs have come up with novel and creative ways to engage students to learn the material in a meaningful way so that they may apply it appropriately in their practicum, clinical experiences, fieldwork, and ultimately post-graduation.
