These collective spaces were, both formal and informal, mechanisms for movement of their populations and the gathering of their resources. To the movement, "the arrival and departure of goods and services, material and human, became the primary mechanism of life" (Ferreira, 1999, p. 10). These observations were made through various dimensions of time and space. They exhibited and found the spatial-temporal and collective organization for the movement of the population and the gathering of their resources and services, such as working or going along, using the streets and squares, markets, the bus lines, etc. (Ferreira, 1999, p. 10). Ferreira (1999) made a metaphorical analysis of the collective spaces, demonstrating that the collective spaces were not only a place to collect their things, but also a place to bring a change to their life, which he defines as mobility, as movement, as flowing, as being, as becoming, as being in motion.

Belknap's answer, naturally, is that we will be surprised that this should arise at all, given as it is that it is a logical consequence of the theory. In other words, "Whether this is a logical consequence and, if so, whether every philosopher will be astonished that it is a logical consequence" are two different questions, and, whether they are or not, they are not the same. Should this answer satisfy? My guess would be that not so far as it is concerned with the latter question. I am pretty sure that not so far as it is concerned with the former. I think that a philosopher who is shocked might have had better understandings than this about the theory, having already accepted its central tenets in full. In passing, I mention this because I think it shows that philosophers would be less than forthcoming in their own defense if they were asked to understand the theory's truth as a logical consequence. As a result, this discussion may allow the argument about it to proceed more fully.
