When a firm enters an oligopolistic market, it faces a strategic decision: whether to enter the market and, if so, whether to enter alone or with a partner. This decision is often modeled using game theory, specifically the concept of a game of entry. In this game, the firm chooses between entering the market (E) or not entering (N). If the firm enters, it chooses between entering alone (A) or with a partner (B). The payoffs for each combination of actions are given in the matrix below.

| | Enter Alone (A) | Enter with Partner (B) | Do Not Enter (N) |
|------------------|-----------------|------------------------|------------------|
| Enter (E) | 10, 10 | 15, 15 | 0, 0 |

The matrix shows that if the firm enters alone, it receives a payoff of 10. If it enters with a partner, it receives a payoff of 15. If it does not enter, it receives a payoff of 0. The matrix also shows that if the firm enters alone, the partner receives a payoff of 10. If the firm enters with a partner, the partner receives a payoff of 15. If the firm does not enter, the partner receives a payoff of 0.

The matrix shows that the firm's best response is to enter with a partner, as this yields a higher payoff (15) than entering alone (10) or not entering (0). The partner's best response is also to enter with the firm, as this yields a higher payoff (15) than not entering (0).

Therefore, the firm's optimal strategy is to enter the market with a partner, and the partner's optimal strategy is to enter the market with the firm.
